.....and then they went on into the woodland to pick berries. The next morning the group decided that it was a good day for a swim, so headed up to the old quarry, long abandoned & now returned to nature. It was a lovely spot with leafy green foliage & wild flowers in abundance. The water itself was crystal clear as the limestone rock in which it nestled purified and cleansed it until it sparkled like diamonds in the late morning sunlight. It was a long, hot trek so each were deep in their own thoughts but all much anticipating a dip in the cool refreshing waters. The girls had made their way to the flooded quarry many times each summer, particularly when the days were hot & long, but Jody, as a guest had never visited the secluded beauty spot before so was especially eager to reach their destination that morning. It never disappointed, both to frequent visitors and newcomers alike, the abundance of wild flowers attracted bees & beautifully delicate winged butterflies which were so opaque they became almost transparent in the sunlight. .....and then they went on into the woodland to pick berries.
