

The Paper Craft Tutor.com

Welcome to my world

Sunday, October 7, 2018

Good morning to you all,

Happily I have managed to get a few cards done this week, whether that was inspired by my trip over to the Range on Tuesday, or from video's I am watching on YouTube each morning while exercising, I have no idea? I am just hoping it continues whatever the trigger may have been!

I have to delve into one of the giant drawers under the bed later & find a card to send to a cousin who celebrates her birthday in the week. She pretty much likes all of my stuff so picking out a card for her will be a pleasure.

The calendar is pretty bare for the coming week, though I do need a trip to the High Street at some stage. So hopefully I will not only get some stamping practice in & get more stamping practice on my new stamp platform.

But I really need to get some work done too as the files are depleting rapidly – though if I could quit deleting stuff from them it would slow down the process dramatically!!!!

Image 1: The current Fine China paper collection will pass into week two today, so a way to go with this one yet. Happily it is a favourite of mine so I won't be binning any along the way, as I have been known to do with other collections!

Image 2: Here is another of those images that I have enhanced in order to fit the circle directly in the centre & then created the decoupage layers from there.

I think it is the colours in this image that attracted me?

Image 3: The first of those three projects I came up with recently & the main difference with these in comparison to previous projects is in the project notes themselves.

Image 5: The second of four in these quad paper sets, again I simply used a couple of the floral papers I had already created to accompany other stuff & added a polka dot & a stripe paper to coordinate with them.

Images 6, 7 & 8: The final set from these floral trios coming up for you this week, here I picked out the final layer from decoupage sheets, that I have already uploaded in the past, & used it to create a new image, Then I went on to create a background using the new image before finally creating the matching envelope.

Image 9: the first of the Christmas stuff for the coming week is this image of Santa. I couldn't do much with it because of the falling snow obscuring the outlines & so ruling out decoupage.

I could have gone for a stacked image I guess but I have never quite decided whether you like those or not, so in the end I decided on a bunch of mirrored toppers!

But they will make real quick cards if you are in a hurry, or become the centre piece for something more ornate if you have some time to play?

Image 10: I thought I would pick out a few Christmas images that I like, but would take too long, or are too complex to create decoupage from & team them up.

Then I created a polka dot backing sheet to accompany each image, & put them all together in one file so it will be easy to download for you & ended up with this design set.

Image 11: The bonus sheet for this morning is this second sheet of 'extras' to accompany the current paper collection. I often merge a few shapes together to create the exact shape I want & then convert that into a digital punch.

So a sheet of stamping tags that will accompany anything you use the current paper collection on, as well as in their own right.

Rita x

I am regularly asked for measurements in inches so recently managed to find a ruler with both etched on. So when I was typing up the notes I measured everything in both & added them to the notes as I went along.

But there is another difference; I have listed all of the dies I have used in the project so you can use the same ones if you have them.

Image 4: Another card kit from the cake file now, I really enjoyed playing around with these images, creating papers to team up with them etc. I particularly like the pink in this one & it looks great as a polka dot background!